The freeing of an innocent From the emperor's furious jealousy. 1802 MAW & Mical Dertysch.

have been propounded. (1) The suggestion that free mason stands for free-stone mason would appear unworthy of attention, but for the curious fact that the earliest known instances of any similar appellation are maître mason de franchise pier, 'master mason of free stone' (Act 25 Edw. III. st. ii. c. 3, A.D. 1350), and sculptores lapidum liberorum, 'carvers of free stones', alleged to occur in a document of 1217 (in Findell's Hist. Mas. 51, citing Wyatt Papworth); the coincidence, however, seems to be merely accidental. (2) The view most generally held is that free masons were those who were 'free' of the masons' guild (see FREE a. 29). Against this explanation many forcible objections have been brought by Mr. G. W. Speth, who suggests (3) that the itinerant masons were called 'free' because they claimed exemption from the control of the local guilds of the towns in which they temporarily settled. (4) Perhaps the best hypothesis is that the term refers to the mediæval practice of emancipating skilled artisans, in order that they might be able to travel and render their services wherever any great building was in process of construction.]

†1. A member of a certain class of skilled workers in stone, in the 14th and following centuries often mentioned in contradistinction to 'rough masons', 'ligiers', etc. They travelled from place to place, finding employment wherever important buildings were being erected, and had a system of secret signs and passwords by which a craftsman who had been admitted on giving evidence of competent skill could be recognized. In later use (16-18th c.) the term seems often to be used merely as a more complimentary synonym of 'mason', implying that the workman so designated belonged to a superior grade. Obs.

2. A member of the fraternity called more fully, Free and Accepted Masons.

Early in the 17th c., the societies of freemasons (in sense 1) began to admit honorary members, not connected with the building trades, but supposed to be eminent for architectural or antiquarian learning. These were called accepted masons, though the term free masons was often loosely applied to them; and they were admitted to a knowledge of the secret signs, and instructed in the legendary history of the craft, which had already begun to be developed. The distinction of being an 'accepted mason' became a fashionable object of ambition, and before the end of the 17th c. the object of the societies of freemasons seems to have been chiefly social and convivial. In 1717, under the guidance of the physicist J. T. Desaguliers, four of these societies or 'lodges' in London united to form a 'grand lodge', with a new constitution and ritual, and a system of secret signs; the object of the society as reconstituted being mutual help and the promotion of brotherly feeling among its members. The London 'grand lodge' became the parent of other 'lodges' in Great Britain and abroad, and there are now powerful bodies of 'freemasons', more or less recognizing each other, in most countries of the world.

Frill (fril), sb. 1 [This and the related FRILL v. 1 are of uncertain origin. The common view is that FRILL v. 3, to shiver, gave rise to a sb. (see FRILL sb. 3) meaning 'the ruffling of a hawk's feathers when shivering', and that the word as applied to an article of costume is a transferred use of this. But this hypothesis finds no support in the rare early instances of the words; and there is no proof that the sb. ever had the alleged sense. Sense 2 of the vb. suggests that it may be a metathetic form of FURL; but this is app. peculiar to Knolles, and should perh. be regarded as an unconnected word. The sb. as used by butchers (sense 3 below) is commonly regarded as a transferred sense from the 'frill' of a shirt; but the analogy of CHITTERLING and of F. fraise (mesentery of a calf, 14th c.; ruff, frill, 16th c.) suggests the possibility that the butchers' sense may be the original (though not recorded until quite recently). Godef. has one quot. for an OF. pple. freole (v. r. freiole) = 'frilled' (said of a shirt); and it is noteworthy that in the 17th c. the F. equivalent of FURL v. (cf. FRILL v. 2) was fresser, which seems to belong to OF. fresser to frill, adorn, f. freole, -ele, dim. of fraise ruff; but it is not easy to see how Eng. frill can be connected with these words.]

1. An ornamental edging made of a strip of any woven material, of which one edge is gathered and the other left loose so as to give it a wavy or fluted appearance. Toby-frill, such as appears on the figure of Toby in the frontispiece of Punch.

4. A hedge; esp. one made of wattled brushwood; also, a hurdle.

[Although this sense appears to be chiefly a development of sense 3, it may partly belong to other words of similar form but etymologically unconnected. (1) The sense 'hedge', and the related FRITH v. 1, might without difficulty be regarded as special uses of FRITH sb. and v. 1; cf. MHG. wride (= FRITH sb.) used in the sense of 'fence, fenced place', meid. Ger. einfridigen to fence in. (2) As in S.W. dialects both fr and ur are represented by ur, it is possible that frith in the sense of 'wattled work' may be partly a literary rendering of a dialectal writh, wreath connected with OE. wreðan (see WRITH, WRATH).

Frog (frɒg). Forms: 1 frogga, 2-7 frogge.

4 frogk, 5 froke, (4 frogge, 5 froggo), 7 frogg. 5-frog. Pl. 2 froggen, 3 wroggen. [OE. froga wk. masc.; a hypocoristic formation (peculiar to Eng.), from the root contained in the various Teut. synonyms, of which there are three different types: (1) OE. froz, (fros*), forse str. masc. (see FROSEN) = Du. vorsch, OHG. fors (MHG. vorsch, mod. F. frösch), ON. froskr - O-Teut. frosko* - 2; (2) ME. frude, FROUD, frog or toad, related by ablaut to ON. fröudr, OSw. pl. frödhir (Da. frø); cf. OF. fruit, frut toad, which is perh. of Scandinavian origin; (3) ON. frauke, whence perh. the ME. froke, given among the forms of the present word.

The etymological relation between the various Teut. words involves some unsolved difficulties. Some scholars, on the ground of OE. froga, and ON. frauke, assume a root-akinship in a guttural, and explain O-Teut. frosko* as frosk* - This does not account for the ME. frude, ON. fröudr, and hence it has been suggested that the common root of all the words is frud (fröd), fröud, früd; O-Teut. frud - frud - frud would by phonetic law become frosko*; the ON. frauke appears to be for frandike*. With regard to OE. froga it may be remarked that the ending -ga occurs in several other names of animals: cf. stagg, deogen, wege. It is possible that froga may owe its form to the analogy of other animal names with this termination.

1. A tailless amphibious animal of the genus Rana, or, in wider sense, of the family Ranidae.

The Prompt. Parv. (Norfolk, c.1400) explains frog, frogge as meaning 'toad' (ufo), while the forms frot and frotte are said to mean 'frog' (rana). It is not known whether this distinction was recognised in the Norfolk dialect of the time; modern East Anglian glossaries do mention it.

Fudge (fʊdʒ), int. and sb. [Origin obscure.]

The int. as used by Goldsmith (quot. 1766) seems from the context merely to represent an inarticulate expression of indignant disgust, though later writers who adopted it from him use it with a more definite meaning. The sb. appears to have been developed partly from the int., and partly from FUDGE v. The etymology suggested in the annexed quot. 1700 can hardly be correct, though Captain Fudge, 'by some called Lying Fudge' (Letter of 1664 in Crouch Posituma Christiana 1712, p. 87) was a real person (the surname is still common in Dorset). The nautical phrase 'You fudge it', associated in 1700 with the name of the mendacious captain, prob. belongs to FUDGE v. 1. In a dialogue of 1702, 'The Present Condition of the English Navy', one of the interlocutors is called 'Young Fudge of the Admiralty', perh. with allusion to the same verb.

1700 Remarks on the Navy in D'Israeli Curr. Lit., Neology (1841), There was, sir, in our time one Captain Fudge, who... always brought home his owners a good cargo of lies, so much that now aboard ship the sailors, when they bear a great lie told, cry out, 'You fudge it.'

1. trans. To fit together or adjust in a clumsy, makeshift, or dishonest manner; to patch or 'fake' up; to 'cook' accounts. Often in schoolboy language: To make (a problem) look as if it had been correctly worked, by altering figures; to conceal the defects of (a map or other drawing) by adjustment of the parts, so that no glaring disproportion is observed; and in other like uses. Cf. FADGE v. 3. Often with up.

-fuge (fū'z), suffix, occurring in words (adj. and sb.) f. mod. L. types in -fugus. According to classical L. analogy, this ending should be connected with fugere to flee (cf. profugus), and should have the sense 'fleeing from' (cf. lucifugus, erifuga). In the medical words febrifugus, lit. driving away fevers, vermifugus expelling worms, however, the ending derives its sense from L. fugare, to put to flight. In imitation of the anglicized forms of these, nonce-wds. in -fuge have occasionally been formed; chiefly on Lat. stems, as DEMONIFUGE (q.v.), dolorifuge, something to drive away pain; but occasionally on Eng. words, as mendacity-fuge.

Ful, obs. form of FOUL.

-ful, suffix, originally identical with FULL a.

1. Forming adjs. In OE. the adj. full, like its equivalent in the other Teut. langs., was used in composition with a preceding sb., forming adjs., the etymological sense of which (= 'full of...') is usually somewhat weakened, so that the words may be rendered 'having', 'characterized by' (the attribute denoted by the sb.); the meaning of the suffix thus differs little from that of L. -sus, -ous. In ME. and in mod.E. many new formations of this type have arisen, some of them from Romanic sbs., as beautiful, graceful; and the suffix is still to some extent productive. In the 14th c. a few new forms arose in which the suffix had the force of 'possessing the qualities of'; e.g. masterful, manful. In OE. -full was not ordinarily appended to adjs.; an instance occurs in deorfull, DARKFUL, used to render L. tenebrosus, and prob. formed in imitation of it. In the 16th and 17th c. a few new words appear f. adjs. or L. adj. stems + -ful, e.g. direful, grateful, tristful, fiereful; prob. these were due to the analogy of older synonyms having this suffix, though it is possible that they may have been in part suggested by It. words like gratevole (gradevole), the ending of which has an accidental resemblance to the Eng. suffix. As the sbs. to which -ful is appended are often nouns of action or state coincident in form with the stems of related vbs., it happens frequently that a word really f. a sb. + -ful is associated in ordinary apprehension rather with the vb. than the sb. (For this there are sometimes special causes; e.g. the sb. thank being obsolete in the sing. while thank vb. is current, the adj. thankful is naturally viewed as a derivative of the latter.) Hence in mod.E. adjs. in -ful are sometimes formed directly on verb-stems, the sense of the suffix being 'apt to', 'able or accustomed to', as in assistful, distractful, crossful, mournful; an example of a passive sense (= -able) occurs in bashful.

2. Forming sbs. In the Teut. langs. the form of expression in which a sb. denoting a receptacle is followed by the adj. FULL in concord with it and governing a genitive (e.g. 'a hand full of corn') was used, not only in its proper sense, but in the transferred sense of 'the quantity that fills or would fill' (the receptacle): see FULL a. 1 b. The ambiguity thus arising is partly obviated by a differentiation of form; the sb. and adj. are treated as independent words when they retain their proper sense, but as forming a compound when the sense is transferred. This differentiation has not been carried out to an equal extent in the various langs. In Ger., handvoll 'handful', mundvoll 'mouthful' are written as single words, but this makes no real difference in their syntactical value; the gender of the quasi-compound is determined by that of its first element, and there is no inflexion. In OE. the development had proceeded a step further in the case of handfull, which, although retaining the fem. gender of hand, was so completely one word as to be declinable (accus. -fulle, pl. -fulla, after the prevailing declension of feminines); in the 14th c. the pl. was handfullis. No other compound of this class is found in OE.; commonly the notion was expressed in the original Teut. manner by the adj. full in concord with the sb. This continued also in ME.; but owing to the practice of using the sing. of a noun of quantity instead of the pl. after a numeral, there is seldom any evidence to show whether the ME. antecedent of a word like dishful is to be regarded as a syntactical combination or as a single word. In mod.E. -ful has become a suffix forming derivatives with the general sense 'quantity that fills or would fill' (something), and may be attached at pleasure to any sb. denoting an object that can be regarded as holding or containing a more or less definite quantity of anything; thus we have not only bottleful, boxful, cansful, spoonful, etc., but bookful, churchful, houseful, worldful, etc. The plural forms spoonfuls, cupfuls, etc., which are still sometimes heard, represent either a survival of, or (much more probably) a return to, the older grammatical view; but though they have thus some appearance of historical justification, they are contrary to good modern usage, and are objectionable on account of their ambiguity.

The ON. -fyltr (handfyltr 'handful', munnyfyltr 'mouthful', etc.) is not identical with the Eng. suffix, but is the sb. fyltr fem. = FILL sb., and the compounds are therefore all fem., whatever the gender of the first element.

Arts* I. 98 When the lead is wasted to a certain degree, a very thin film of it only remains on the silver, which causes the iridescent appearance, like the colours of soap-bubbles; a phenomenon, called by the old chemists, fulguration.

More strictly applied to a bore or tube produced by the passage of lightning into a sandy soil. 1884 CORNH. Mag. Nov. 526 In sand or rock, where lightning has struck, it often forms long hollow tubes, known to the calmly discriminating geological intelligence as fulgurites.

6. Math. A variable quantity regarded in its relation to one or more other variables in terms of which it may be expressed, or on the value of which its own value depends.

[This use of the L. functio is due to Leibnitz and his associates. A paper in the Acta Eruditorum for 1692, pp. 169-170, signed 'O. V. E.', but prob. written by Leibnitz, uses functiones in a sense hardly different from its ordinary untechnical sense, to denote the various 'offices' which a straight line may fulfil in relation to a curve, viz. its tangent, normal, etc. In the same journal for 1694, p. 316, Leibnitz defines functio as 'a part of a straight line which is cut off by straight lines drawn solely by means of a fixed point, and of a point in the curve which is given together with its degree of curvature'; the examples given being the ordinate, abscissa, tangent, normal, etc. As the functiones (in Leibnitz' sense) of a curve are variable quantities having a fixed mutual relation, this use of the word easily developed into the modern sense, which occurs in the writings of the Bernoullis early in the 18th c. A somewhat peculiar use occurs about 1713, in Leibnitz' Hist. et Origo Calc. Diff. (Math. Schriften ed. Gerhard V. 408), where he says that just as constant quantities have their 'functions', viz. powers and roots, so variables have also 'functions' of a third kind, viz. differentials.]

Furlong (fū'lon). Forms: 1 furlang, -ung, 2 -eng, 3-5 fur(e)lang(e), 4 ferlong, fourlonge, 4-5 fur(e)lang(e), 4-6 -long(e), 4-5 fur(e)longe, 4- furlong. Pl. 4-5 for, furlong. [OE. furlang str. neut., f. furh, FURROW + lang, LONG a.]

1. Originally, the length of the furrow in the common field, which was theoretically regarded as a square containing ten acres. As a lineal measure, the furlong therefore varied according to the extent assigned at various times and places to the ACRE, but was usually understood to be equal to 40 poles (rods, perches). As early as the 9th c. it was regarded as the equivalent of the Roman stadium, which was $\frac{1}{2}$ of a Roman mile; and hence furlong has always been used as a name for the eighth part of an English mile, whether this coincided with the agricultural measure so called or not. The present statute furlong is 220 yards, and is equal both to the eighth part of a statute mile, and to the side of a square of 10 statute acres.

Fy, obs. form of FIE.

Fy: see also Fr.

-fy (foi), suffix, forming verbs. The older Eng. vbs. in -fy are adoptions of Fr. vbs. in -fier, which are either adapted from Lat. vbs. in -ficare or formed on the analogy of vbs. so originating. (The form -fier was used as the representative of L. -ficare on the analogy of words like saintifier:-santificare.) The Lat. vbs. in -ficare were originally derivatives of adjs. in -ficus (see -FIO), though subsequently the suffix could be used to form vbs. without the intervention of an adj. They may be divided into three classes (corresponding to three classes of adjectives in -ficus: see -FIO), all of which are represented by adapted words in Eng.: (1) vbs. f. sbs., with the sense 'to make, produce', as pacificare (orig. intr. to make peace) pacify, adificare edify, or 'to make or convert into something', as deificare deify; (2) f. adjs., with the sense 'to bring into a certain state', as santificare sanctify; (3) f. vb.-stems, with causative sense, as horrificare horrify. In med.L. there was a tendency to substitute -ficare for -facere in the few Lat. vbs. so ending, and hence Fr. and Eng. vbs. in -fier, -fy sometimes correspond to Lat. vbs. in -facere; e.g. F. stupifier (but in pa. pple. stupéfait as well as stupéfié) stupefy, OF. satisfier (but mod.F. satisfaire) satisfy, F. liquéfier liquefy, F. rubéfier rubefy, med.L. calcificare calcify. Exe. in the case of these few vbs. the ending has normally the form -ify (for the reason see -FIO). It is now used as the regular rendering of -ficare in new words adopted from Lat. or formed on assumable Lat. types, and is also freely added to Eng. adjs. and sbs. to form vbs., mostly somewhat jocular or trivial, with the senses: 'to make a specified thing', as speechify; 'to assimilate to the character of something' (chiefly in pa. pple., as countersified); 'to invest with certain attributes', as Frenchify. (A large proportion of these vbs. are from sbs. and adjs. ending in -y or -ry, the suffix then having the form -fy instead of the usual -ify. An early example is beautify, but the analogy on which this word was formed is not clear.) In a few cases the suffix has been quite irregularly added to vb. stems, but the words are either obsolete, as dedify, hindrify, ornify, or merely jocular or illiterate, as arguify. The noun of action related to vbs. in -ify normally ends in -ification, though, by confusion of suffix, petrification is used in Eng. where Fr. has more correctly pétrification. The words in which -fy represents L. -facere have their corresponding nouns of action ending in -faction.

The following examples illustrate the freedom with which this suffix has been used in the formation of nonce-words. 1602 DEKKER Satirromastix Liva, Nay by Sesu you shall bee a Poet, though not Lawfeyed, yet Nettleyfed so. 1647 TRAPP *Comm. G.

G (dʒ), the seventh letter of the Roman alphabet, was originally a differentiated form of C; for its early history see that letter. In Latin G represented the voiced guttural stop; but in the later period of the language it must have been pronounced before front vowels as a palatal, its representation in the Rom. langs. being precisely the same as that of Lat. I consonant (J); hence in OF. G before e, i was pronounced like J, viz. as the assimilated (dʒ).

In OE. the letter stood for four different sounds, viz. the voiced guttural and palatal stop (in this Dictionary represented by g, ȝ), and the voiced guttural and palatal spirant (here printed g, ȝ). The precise distribution of these sounds is much disputed, but if we confine our view to the very end of the OE. period the following statements may be made. Initial G before back vowels was a guttural stop (g), developed from an earlier spirant. Initial G before front vowels was a palatal spirant (y). Medially and finally, G represented a guttural or a palatal, according to the nature of the associated sounds; in the combinations ng and gg (written cg when palatal, rarely when guttural) it was a stop, and in other positions a spirant. In early ME., or perh. in late OE., the palatal stop developed into the complex sound (dʒ), thus coinciding with the power of G before e, i, in contemporary French.

In early ME. the continental form of G (approximately g) was used for the two sounds which the letter had in French, (g) and (dʒ), while the OE. form ȝ was used for the sounds peculiar to native words, viz. the guttural and palatal spirants (ȝ, y). Ormīn attempted to differentiate the symbol g into two, g = (dʒ), and ȝ = (g); but his example was not followed. The symbol ȝ gradually came to assume a form indistinguishable from that used for Z in contemporary MSS.; in this Dictionary the form ȝ is employed for ME. words. This symbol was commonly used in ME. for the sound of (y) initial and final, for the guttural and palatal unvoiced spirant final or before t (as in inoutȝ, auȝt, niȝt, OE. genōht, iht, nihht), and, so long as the sound remained in the language, for the guttural voiced spirant. From the 13th c., however, the ȝ was by some scribes wholly or partially discarded for y or gh; a few texts have ȝh. In the 15th c. vocabularies the words beginning with ȝ are at the end of the alphabet. Caxton uses the symbol sparingly, chiefly before final t. The English printers of the 16th c. scarcely use it at all; but in Scotland it survived longer, and has left a trace in the use of z for y in the spelling of surnames like Menzies and Dalziel, and of such words as capercaillie, gabrielunzie.

In modern English G has the so-called 'hard' sound (g) at the end of a word, before a consonant or a, o, u, (exc. in gaol, gaoler), and in words of Teutonic etymology before e and i, as in give, get; also in Hebrew proper names, as Gedaliah, Gideon. In words from Lat. or Romance it has the 'soft' sound (dʒ) before e, i, y; and at the end of a syllable, in words of whatever origin, the sound (dʒ) is represented always by ge or ge, the letter j not being used in this position. The combination gn is sounded n initially or at the end of a syllable. When the combination ng occurs in one syllable, the g is now silent, serving only to give to the n the value of (ŋ). With regard to the pronunciation of ng in the middle of a disyllable, modern usage is somewhat inconsistent: in the inflexions and derivatives of verbs the g is silent, as in singer, singeth, singing (siŋgə, siŋgəθ, siŋgɪŋ), but is sounded in the comparatives and superlatives of adjs., as in younger, longer (jʊŋgə, lɒŋgə), and the other words generally, as finger (fɪŋgə).

The combination gh is in a few words (agest, ghastly, ghost) a mere capricious substitute for g (cf. Caxton's frequent ghoos, ghoot, gherle = goose, goat, girl). Elsewhere it chiefly represents the older guttural or palatal spirant (OE. ȝ or ȝh), which in modern pronunciation is either dropped, as in high, night, through, plough, or replaced by (f), as in laugh, rough, tough; a special development has taken place in hough (hʊk).

II. Used as a symbol, with reference to its place (7th) in the alphabet.

Gab (gæb), v.¹ Forms: 2-4 gabbe-n, 4-6 gabb(e), (5 gabe), 3-gab. [app. a. OF. gabber (also written gauter, gaiber, once, perh. erroneously, jaber), to mock, deride, jest; the word is found (perh. as an adoption from OFr.) as Pr. and OSP. gabar, It. gabbare, to mock, jest, Pg. gabar to praise, refl. to boast. Cf. the related GAB sb.¹

Most etymologists regard the Rom. vb. and sb. as adoptions of the Teut. words which appear as ON. gabba to mock, gabb mockery (GAB sb.¹), OFris. gabbia to accuse, prosecute (cf. sense 2 below), MDu. and MLG. gabben to mock, deceive. But in words of early adoption, Teut. ga- normally became ja- in Central French; further, the occurrence of bb in Teut. words (apart from hypocoristic and onomatopoeic formations and WGer. bb from ß) is rare and etymologically obscure; and the chronology of the various Teut. forms would not forbid the supposition that they were all adopted from OFr. If the words be either Teut. or Rom. formations from a Teutonic root, they may perhaps be connected ultimately with GAPE v.; cf. the Icel. use of gap in the sense of clamour, jeers; on the other hand they may be onomatopoeic formations expressing the notion of loud outcry, chatter; cf. GAB v.², GABBLE, GAGGLE v.]

Ger. weide pasture, pasturage), corresp. to OE. widd, ON. veid-r hunting; — OTeut. waidō*, -þjā. The twofold sense of the OHG. verb seems to be reflected in the Rom. form, which was used for 'to cultivate land' (so in OFr.;

see GAIN v. 3, GAINAGE, GAINOR), as well as for 'to gain, win, earn'; the latter sense, which the word retains in mod.Fr. and It., may be in part developed from the OHG. sense 'to hunt'.]

2. In the following passage the word is a literal rendering of the Gr. καταβαίνω. The sense of the original is disputed; most scholars, regarding the clause as qualified by the foregoing negative, take the verb as having, with or without a touch of irony, the extended sense 'to obtain whatever good or bad' (Johnson, s.v. Gain); so Liddell and Scott, also Revised Version ('gotten'). Others assign to the Gr. vb. the sense 'to spare oneself, avoid, save'; so De Wette, Alfrod, Blass, and others. Both uses of the vb. occur in Gr. writers; it is not at all clear which view was taken by the translators, or whether they deliberately adopted an ambiguous rendering.

Gale (gēl), sb.³ Also 6-7 galle, gayle, (? g. gall). [Of obscure origin.

Possibly elliptical for gale (or gall) wind (see quot. 1619 in 3) where gale may have been originally an adj. Gall (gɔl), sb.² Forms: 1 zealla, 4-6 galle, 4-7 gaule, 7 gal, 6-9 Sc. gaw, 6- gall. [OE. zealla wul. masc., a sore on a horse, corresponds in meaning to MSw. galle wul. masc., MLG., MHG., mod.G. galle fem., Du. gal fem.; in Ger. and Du. the word has or has had (see Grimm Wb. and the Nederl. Woordenb.) the senses 'pimple or blister generally, barren spot in a field, flaw or rotten place in a rock', etc. All these words are in the several langs. formally identical with those repr. *GALL sb.*¹, and it seems not unlikely that they may be actually identical; the notion of 'venom' (*GALL sb.*¹) passes easily into that of 'envenomed sore' (cf. *FELON sb.*²); the other senses illustrated below may be explained as referring to the gall as a part of the carcass which has to be removed as useless and offensive. The ON. and MSw. galle wk. masc., 'fault, defect' (in phrases equivalent to 'without gall'), seems to admit of the same explanation.

It is, however, probable that words of different etymology have influenced the sense-development in the Eng. and other Teut. langs. In the Rom. langs. the word for *GALL sb.*³ (F. galle, It. gala, Sp. agalla) was used for a swelling on the fetlock of a horse (=Ger. flossgalle, windgalle, Eng. WINDGALL), and Ger. writers of the 16th c. argue that the word ought, being a transferred use of galle gall-nut, to be limited to this specific meaning. In Eng. the word seems to have been influenced (through GALL v.) by OF. galler, galer to rub, scratch, gall; possibly also by F. gale fem., itch, scurf, scab (also, flaw in cloth, whence Du. gaal); the source of these words is unknown, one suggestion being that they are derived from L. galla *GALL sb.*³.

1. Originally, a painful swelling, pustule, or blister, esp. in a horse (cf. WINDGALL). In later use (?influenced by GALL v.), a sore or wound produced by rubbing or chafing.

Gallant (gæ'lant, gæl'ant), a. and sb. Forms: 4-6 galant (e), 5-8 gallant (e), 5-6 Sc. galland, 6 gallanto, -aunt, -aunde, 6- gallant. [a. F. galant (recorded from the 14th c.), pa. pp. of OF. galer to make merry, make a show, (connected with gale merry-making = It. Sp. gala; see *GALE sb.*² and GALA). The early senses of the adj. in Fr. are: 'dashing, spirited, bold' (obsolete in Fr., but the source of the prevailing sense in mod. Eng.); 'gay in appearance, handsome, gaily attired'; and 'fitted for the pleasures of society, attractive in manners, courteous, polished'. The last of these gave rise in mod. fr. to the specialized senses 'politely attentive to women', and 'amorous, amatory', which were adopted into Eng. in the 17th c., and are usually distinguished by the accentuation gallant. The It. galante, courteous, honourable, and Sp. galante, gaily dressed, sprightly, galan, galano gaily dressed, seemed to have been adopted from French. The use as sb., which is recorded in Eng. somewhat earlier than the adjectival use, was adopted from Fr., in which language all the senses of the sb. had been developed.

The origin of the OFr. verb galer is disputed. The view of Diez, that it was f. the OHG. gail = ME. Gole, wanton, is now abandoned, as the normal Central French form on that supposition should begin with g; the form galer (for which water occurs as a variant) points to an original initial u. Hence most recent scholars regard the vb. as ad. OHG. uallon to wander, go on pilgrimage; but the transition of sense offers difficulties that are not fully cleared up.]
